THE PASSING OF DEPEW.

For many years Chauncey Depew was accepted as the most available and willing substitute for the after-dinner orator. He never was an orator, but he was a secondhand humorist. His taste in funny stories had been studiously cultivated, his memory was excellent, and his nerve was great. The fact that a story had come rolling down the corridors of time, serving successive generations of raconteurs, did not deter Depew from repeating it in any company provided it had merit. He was a laborious collector of antique humor, and once his reputation as a dispenser of funny tales was made he was in frequent demand. On a few occasions he was taken seriously -as when on a Washington anniversary he was selected as the chief orator. He proved a dismal disappointment. To newspaper reporters he owed much of his prominence. He was shrewd enough to welcome with ready speech every despairing newspaper man who was in need of material for copy. It was inevitable that this excessive publicity should weary the people at last. Had there been a "Better Dead" society for the elimination of oppressive public characters he would have disappeared quietly and unaccountably long ago.
